Two problems remain regarding Christian theological teachings about grace, the first which grants that God could indeed convert the heart of every sinner and yet leave the freedom of will in its integrity. So rather than being consciously scared of death, you might latch on to a specific situation instead about which to be anxious. And you'd have to be all-powerful, so I mean that takes a lot more faith [fades] seems to me that a morality based on belief in a divine command theory of ethics, that one must do what God says one should do because that is definitive of what is good and disobedience is evil, is a very primitive morality.
